Excerpt: . . . that a great dinner was to be given at the City Hotel, and that he, MDowell, was to be a waiter there. And it was then agreed between MDowell, Farrel, and himself, that they should steal whatever they could. --Kelly put on MDowells surtout coat, his own being very shabby, and they went to the hotel. There Kelly assisted the waiters, and stole two bundles, which MDowell and he took to Farrels house. That about dusk Mr. Black arrived, and he saw the trunk placed in No. 13. At this time MDowell and Farrel were at home, whither Kelly went, and told them of the trunk. Then all three went back to the hotel, and Kelly went up stairs, brought the trunk down, and in the passage, near the front door, delivered it to Farrel. Farrel afterwards told him that there were watches and jewellery in the trunk, and some papers, which latter he had burnt. It appeared from all the testimony that this confession had not been extorted by promises or threats, but was made voluntarily. Kelly professed much contrition for his misconduct, imputing the whole to Farrel, and declared that he had made the disclosure simply because he suffered deeply in his feelings for Mr. Blacks great loss. The examination of MDowell before the police magistrates, after he had been arrested in consequence of Kellys disclosure, was then read, and fully agreed in all particulars with Kellys account. Farrel, in his examination,...
