It is also desirable, for many reasons, that a standard form of traffic record be generally adopted. However, the minor differences in effect between various kinds of vehicles decreases in importance with the increase in number and variety of traffic. It would, therefore, seem to be quite sufficient to establish a standard form of comparatively simple classification for use on the heaviest traveled streets, which could be further elaborated, by sub-divisions where so desired, for use in particular cases where the frequency of traffic was not such as to preclude the possibility of obtaining information on the minor points. The segregation of a traffic count on Fifth Avenue into numbers and classes of vehicles moving north and south would be difficult and of doubtful value in studies affecting the selection of a pavement for this street. On the other hand, in the case of some market roads leading into a city, the selection of a roadway surface might be materially affected by the fact that the units of traffic follow each other closely in single lines for short periods near the beginning and end of each day as is quite frequently the case. (c) The average abilities of the observers usually available will affect the decision as to the form of record of traffic to be attempted to be secured. Such records are seldom if ever made personally by engineers capable of appreciating the...
